Helping Families Have Hope

PARENTtalk: A Unique Resource

“This would be easier to tell someone my son is a drug addict, drug pusher, or even a murderer than a sex offender.” —PARENT

These words speak to the difficulty, isolation, and stigma often associated with being a parent of a child with sexual behavior problems. Every day on the Stop It Now! national Helpline we speak to callers concerned that a child in their family may be at risk to act out an inappropriate sexual behavior with another child. In the last year alone, over a third of all Helpline calls concerned at-risk or sexually abusive behaviors between two children. This data mirrors national statistics indicating that between 30-50% of sexual abuse cases are committed by a child under the age of 18.

In the early 1990s, Stop It Now! conducted focus groups that included parents of children with sexual behavior problems. What we learned at that time was profound and is still echoed today by Helpline callers and in more recent research conducted by our Sites and Affiliates in the United States and the United Kingdom.

During the focus groups, we heard parents talk about their need for more information on healthy sexual development, warning signs, and how to talk about child sexual abuse with other adults. They voiced the need for a consistent response among professionals when a child has committed a sexual offense. They desperately wanted to know that they were not alone. And lastly, they voiced a need for a sense of hope—hope that life can get better.

In response to this data, Stop It Now! created PARENTtalk, the first newsletter specifically designed for parents of children with sexual behavior problems. The focus groups and the newsletter itself were made possible with funding support from the Jessica B. Cox Foundation and the Vermont Children’s Trust Fund. PARENTtalk was the first publication of its kind and is still the only resource we know of specifically for parents of young people at-risk to sexually abuse. We are proud to have published 12 issues of this invaluable newsletter to date.
Protecting Children and Ministering to Sexual Offenders: A Faith Perspective

by Reverend Debra W. Haffner

The Reverend Debra W. Haffner is the director of the Religious Institute on Sexual Morality, Justice, and Healing (www.religiousinstitute.org) and an ordained Unitarian Universalist minister.

As a sexuality educator and as a minister, I help people learn to treat each other with dignity and respect. I believe that our sexuality is a sacred gift to be celebrated with holiness and integrity. I am pained by the brokenness, oppression and loss of meaning that too many people experience about their sexuality. The sexual abuse of children and adolescents is a soul-scarring desecration of their sexuality and their spirituality.

Two years ago, the Unitarian Universalist Association asked me to begin a project to help its congregations address issues of sexual abuse prevention and the inclusion of persons with a history of sex offenses into the congregation. I interviewed dozens of congregations, clergy, and sex offender treatment specialists. I also had the opportunity to work with the staff and board members of Stop It Now! and learned a great deal from their excellent resources. This winter, the UUA published the results of this work as an online manual called Balancing Acts: Keeping Children Safe in Congregations (www.uua.org/cde/ethics/balancing).

Any congregation that includes children, teenagers, and families, regardless of its denomination, needs to be addressing sexual abuse prevention, and many of them will need your help. Given the prevalence of child sexual abuse, many congregations and clergy are faced with the decision of if and how a person with a history of sex offenses can safely be included in the adult life of the congregation. They need to understand that the treated sex offender who is known to the congregation and who agrees to abide by a limited access agreement for participation is much less of a risk to children than the adult or teenager whose sexual interest in children is known only to themselves.

Thus, congregations also need to develop and implement policies to keep all adults, teens, and children safe from sexual abuse and harassment. Faith communities can offer a lifespan sexuality education program consistent with their own values that includes a program to help parents educate their children about healthy sexuality. Such education provides children with the skills they need to understand their own

A Message from Maxine Stein, CEO

Stop It Now!’s website, www.stopitnow.org, steers several hundred calls a month to the national Helpline. In fact, 50% of our calls come to us this way. In this day and age, there is no doubt about the importance and effectiveness of a strong web presence. But for Stop It Now!, whose work is about one of the most charged and difficult issues our society faces, the website is much more than a portal of information and resources. Our website, which averages 600 visitors a day, has become a confidential place for people to access sensitive information in the privacy of their own space.

The sexual abuse of children is not easy to talk about. The very people who most need to speak up often feel they don’t know what to say or with whom to talk. We have learned in our work that adults who are concerned about child sexual abuse in their family or their community remain silent because they feel they have nowhere to turn. For many, it takes great courage to pick up the phone and reach out to our confidential services; for those that don’t, our website offers a safe place to begin tackling their concerns honestly.

Our website puts a human face on the issue of child sexual abuse. We post Stories of Hope that show healing from child sexual abuse is possible for all the people involved. We highlight the unique work of our sites and affiliates around the country. As a social change tool, the Stop It Now! website is place to reach people, motivate them, empower them, and educate them. Ultimately, we hope by reading through the information and resources that we provide, that people will be motivated to take positive action. While the website is not a substitute for personal help, it is a strong and effective beginning.

We want our website to be even more than it is now. We want to have content that will be both deeper and broader. Our website has the potential to become the “go to” site for a wide range of people in communities, families, and professional fields such as law enforcement, child protection services, public health and policy, mental health treatment and more. Stop It Now’s website could become THE place to search for an answer, a referral, or important information. We would like to include on our website legislative updates, a list of activities around the country relevant to our work, more extensive information about our sites and affiliates, and a library of relevant books and articles.

Our vision is a dream and goal for 2005-2006. We need to raise $15,000 for this work, and I welcome inquiries from interested people or groups who would like to offer financial support. Please call me at 413-587-3500. I look forward to your participation in this important endeavor.

development and to reach out for help if it is needed. This education also allows a community to talk with children and teens about behaviors that may lead them to abuse other children as well. And faith communities need to offer support to their adult congregants who have suffered sexual abuse and violence.

As people of faith, we must hear the cries of those who suffer from the failure of religious communities to address sexuality issues, including the spiritual devastation that sexual abuse brings. I invite you to think about how you can help faith communities promote sexual morality, justice, and healing.

Bob Falconer: Financial Supporter

When Bob Falconer heard about Stop It Now! in the mid 1990s, he was no stranger to helping children. As a writer, activist, philanthropist, and sexual abuse survivor, Bob had long been involved in the field of child sexual abuse prevention. Bob believes that the way children are raised determines the quality of the culture and the political structure in a society. “If we continue to raise our children violently and in a violent society,” Bob says, “we will foster the negative behavior that perpetuates abuse.”

Bob says that until he learned about Stop It Now!, he felt that “most approaches toward prevention were like emptying the ocean with a teaspoon.” He was drawn to Stop It Now! because it was “ahead of the curve.” He is particularly interested in work related to juvenile offenders, a highly treatable population that represents great hope for stopping the cycle of abuse. He also feels strongly about reaching out to families, especially non-offending parents. Stop It Now!’s newest brochure, Let’s Talk, addresses these needs and is the kind of groundbreaking work that Bob has come to recognize as Stop It Now!’s extraordinary contribution to a complex problem.

From his first small, unrestricted grant to Stop It Now! almost ten years ago, Bob has been a consistent friend and supporter. He served on the Board of Directors from 1999 to 2004; he helped provide funding to start the Stop It Now! site in Georgia; and he joined the Founder’s Safety Net for Children when it was created three years ago. Bob has also participated in the Stop It Now! Dialogue Project by talking about his experience as a sexual abuse survivor in a joint forum with recovering offenders, an experience he found to be personally valuable.

If you would like to join Bob and Stop It Now! in our work to prevent child sexual abuse, please call Maxine Stein at 413-587-3500.
Each issue of PARENTtalk includes an article written by a parent or caregiver of a child with sexual behavior problems. The most recent issue, Spring 2005, featured a story from a parent whose older son sexually abused her younger son. It is a courageous story about the complexity of being the parent of both the child who was abused and the child who perpetrated that abuse.

In addition to a story from a parent, each PARENTtalk newsletter contains an article written by a professional in the field of youth and sexual behavior. These articles have touched upon issues such as healthy sexual development, specialized treatment, and support groups.

Upcoming issues of PARENTtalk will focus on internet-related concerns with youth and also on children with developmental disabilities or mild autistic disorders such as Asperger’s Syndrome who also exhibit sexual behavior problems. We also have a Spanish issue in the works!

Stop It Now! receives consistent feedback about the value of PARENTtalk from parents and professionals alike. In the words of a Helpline caller, “I cannot tell you how thankful I was to get PARENTtalk. I used to feel like I was the only one in the world going through this!” And from a clinician working with youth who have sexually offended we heard: “I was having trouble getting the parents in our support group to talk together. Then I brought several copies of your newsletter to group. While reading the stories out loud together, the parents all of a sudden opened up!”

If you are a parent and would like to share your story or would like more information about PARENTtalk, please call the Stop It Now! Helpline or send an email to info@stopitnow.org.

Stop It Now! created a groundbreaking public health approach to prevent the perpetration of child sexual abuse. Its public policy, public education and research programs have protected our children by emphasizing adult and community responsibility. These programs reach out to adults who are concerned about inappropriate sexualized behavior in another adult, adolescent, or child, and to adults who are concerned about their own thoughts and behaviors.

Collaborations in the Field

In March, Stop It Now! was invited to a groundbreaking national meeting—the Surgeon General’s Workshop on Making Prevention of Child Maltreatment a National Priority: Implementing Innovations of a Public Health Approach. CEO Maxine Stein participated in this two-day think tank that included participants such as Dr. Elias Zerhouni, the Director of the National Institutes of Health and Carol Berkowitz, the President of the American Academy of Pediatrics. The purpose of the meeting was to challenge leaders from diverse sectors of the child maltreatment fields to “firmly establish and sustain an inclusive and comprehensive public health prevention framework.” Maxine reported that “The Surgeon General’s clear commitment to addressing child maltreatment signifies the vital shift in thinking and action that is needed in the United States to bring a public health solution to preventing and eradicating child sexual abuse. Stop It Now! is gratified to play a central role in this work alongside federal agencies, other national organizations, and community-based efforts.”

Director of Public Education Joan Tabachnick was recently invited to join the Prevention Advisory Committee (PAC) of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children (NCMEC). Chaired by Cordelia Anderson, a Stop It Now! Minnesota Advisory Board member, the committee’s goal is to build prevention partnerships and coalitions around the U.S., to advise in the development of NCMEC’s prevention strategic plan, and to develop policy and organizational practices to promote prevention.
